    Fifty feet away, three male lions lay by the road. They didn't appear to have a hair on their heads. Noting the colour of their noses (leonine noses darken as they age, from pink to black). Craig estimated that they were six years old-young adults. "This is what we came to see. They are really maneless". Craig, a professor at the University of Minnesota, is arguably the leading expert on the majestic Serengeti lion, whose head is mantled, in long, thick hair. He and Peyton West, a doctoral student who has been working with him in Tanzania, had never seen the Tsavo lions that live some 200 miles east of Serengeti. The scientists had partly suspected that the maneless male lions were adolescents mistaken for adults by amateur observers. Now they know better.

    The Tsavo research expedition was mostly Peyton's show. She had spent several years in Tanzania, compiling the data she needed to answer a question that ought to have been answered long ago. Why do lions have manes ? It's the only cat wild or domestic, that displays such ornamentation.

Earthworms are the answer for every garden problem, according to Harold John Weigel. They can increase crop production, turn and freshen soil, and produce faster growth. Simply take care of the earthworms, and the earthworms will take care of the garden. Weigel is extremely enthusiastic about earthworms. They are tremendous creatures, "the intestines of the Earth", Weigel says quoting Charles Darwin. Weigel is so excited about the benefits of Worms that he is writing a book about them. He gardens using thousands of earthworms. He has persuaded his wife to put worms in her house plant pots. He even suggests eating worms, which he claims, are 70 per cent protein. He has dreams of armies of earthworms helping to replace topsoil in the 74 countries. It is a fact, he says, that topsoil is disappearing every year through erosion. Wind and water carry away the soil and nature need's centuries to replace it.
